HELPING A STUDENT IN DISTRESS

As a faculty and/or staff member at MSU, you have frequent and direct contact with students. When students experience college life, they may face numerous stressors that cause varying degrees of distress. Given your role, experience, training and personality, you may become more involved in supporting students during times of stress. The purpose of this information is to build confidence in your personal style to make the best determination of how and when to intervene with students.

As mentioned previously, all students will face challenges or stress during college. Stress can take many forms, ranging from relationship problems, family crises and physical illness to the death of a loved one, anxiety, depression, suicidal thoughts, addictions and even psychotic episodes. What may be stressful for one student may be a full-blown crisis for another. How an individual is able to cope with adversity and how these challenges impact their academic functioning will vary greatly given their life experiences, coping strategies and individual situations.

FINANCIAL WELL-BEING & EMERGENCY AID

Financial well-being plays an integral role in student success. If students are unable to navigate the financial aspects of college attendance, they are unable to continue progress toward their degree. SENSE OF BELONGING AND ITS IMPACT ON STUDENT SUCCESS

People may view belonging as a personal matter—something experienced at an individual level that is an individual's responsibility. But it also requires ongoing effort by organizations and institutions (Samura, 2022).

Institutions of higher education are anticipating a demographic contraction in collegegoers that is already impacting regions of the country and is forecasted to go nationwide by 2030 (EAB, 2020). At the same time, higher education disparity gaps in student attainment across the country are exponentially contributing to rising attrition rates. Universities with a strategic eye on the future understand the implications and are acting. While enrollment management strategies have traditionally placed many of its resources into competitive, zero-sum recruitment efforts, forward thinking higher education policy makers are shifting focus to a more comprehensive student life-cycle approach with retention at its core. Reforming advising, academic planning, and administrative processes are generally first steps towards reducing student attrition rates at universities. From there, policy makers who are building belonging and academic confidence into their students' experiences at an early period on campus are seeing the positive effects in increased rates of retention, graduation, and well-being. A growing body of research is linking

'sense of belonging' to significantly important outcomes including retention, persistence, graduation, and well-being (Supiano, 2018). As the belongingness literature pours in, student success champions are attempting to better understand the 'sense of belonging' phenomenon and how best to harness its effects on their campuses. Conventional approaches apply a one-time intervention and hope for (but do not effectively achieve) 'enduring belongingness.' More recent strategies better understand the roller-coaster-ride of 'belongingness' that is continuously shaped and impacted by the multitude of experiences and activities encountered by college students. These multi-pronged, individual-to-organization-strategies, are more comprehensively applied routinely and consistently across a student's co-curricular experience with the aim of leading to an 'enduring' sense of belonging and ultimately success. As belonging continues to trend in the student success circles, a better understanding of the phenomenon is crucial to holistically integrating it into student experiences. For example, one author reveals the importance of understanding belonging as more of an ongoing process that takes effort, resources, and shared responsibility by not just individuals but also organizations and institutions (Samura, 2022). Additionally, while a sense of belonging can fluctuate over time based on individual or organizational interactions, an individual's sense of belonging can also fluctuate based on their changing environment whether it be in the cafeteria, resident hall, or classroom. As co-creators of student experiences here at Mississippi State University, we all play a role in leaving students with a sense of belonging that will endure through college and lead to graduation and lifelong success.
